PALESTINE, TEXAS, NOVEMBER 23, 1903.

THE SMOKE.

It is amusing to read the State papers on the smoke situation. Nearly all attribute the smoke to some local condition.

The Houston Chronicle says a cloud of smoke enshrouded Houston, as a result of farmers burning brush east of that city.

A Beaumont paper says it is because of a prairie fire over in Louisiana, east of Beaumont.

The Daily Visitor of this city a trained politician. says it is Anderson county farmers trying to burn up the boll weevil.

Nacogdoches reports that the most destructive forest fires ever known to East Texas are raging east of that city.

Dallas reports it impossible to see exceeding three blocks in that city, and attributes the smoke to immense forest fires in the East Texas pine belt.

a dozen other towns report forest to Tyler and return of $1.00. The and prairie fires.

smoke is so dense that it is dangerous for all vessels, and one serious the game. wreck has already occurred, the schooner Mendocino going ashore.

From various points along the Mississippi river steamboats have tied up on account of the dense smoke.

From all reports it seems the same condition prevails over all of Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, the Indian Territory, Gulf of Mexico, and even points further east.

The phenomenon will be discussed for weeks to come by scientific men, and perhaps a true very disagreeable.

THEATRICAL.

Not many farces now being presented to the American public contain the intricate situations woven so deftly into the plot of "Are You A Mason?" the Dietrichstein effort, which will be presented at the Temple Opera House

The woof of the piece recounts the adventures of one Amos Bloodgood, an elderly and rather gay character, who in order to satisfy his wife, and partly as a shield for his own escapades, pretends to join the Masons: but never does. Prolific of speech, and glib of tongue, he regales his better half with wonderful accounts of his Masonic success. To such an extent do s he deceive his spouse, that extri cation from his predicament seems altato crops in this section people most impossible, and matters are further tangled by the appearance of a prospective son-in-law upon whom the obligation of "riding the goat" is also put. He follows his father-in-law's 000,000. This is a chance for lead never joins, and is under the same Palestine capitalists who have lost necessity of restoring to all manners of expediences in order to conceal the hoax. The net gradually tightens about the pair, and the end of the third act finds them almost at the end of negro criminal who captured the their ropes, the audience in one roar bloodhound put on his track, and at the involved situation, and Mrs. sold him for enough to buy a rail- Bloodgood triumphant in the cause of Masonry. The deception, however, is gradually discovered, and the pretenders forgiven on condition that they really become bona-fide Masons. A competent company has been secured, the entire production is carried intact, and a performance of high dramatic standard is pronounced when pears here in "Satania" tomorrow night confesses to two great weaknasses; her love for her work, and for a thorough bred horse. Miss Trescott can hardly wait until she reaches the hotel to don her habit, and can be seen almost every afternoon when most favorites of the stage are slumbering vigorously in order to "catch up" galloping through the streets, out in the park or the open country. A handsome women never looks better than in a well set up riding habit, and Miss Trescott thus attired and well mounted attracts almost as much attention as she does when enacting her trying role as "Satania."

"The Merchant of Venice."

Nowhere in literature or in stage lore has there ever been found the equal of the character of "Shylock," in "The Merchant of Venice."
